

SOVEREIGN HUMAN STANDARD

CC0 1.0 (Public Domain)

PREAMBLE

This Sovereign Human Standard is established under the auspices of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (UNGA Res. 217 A (III), 1948), serving as its technical implementation protocol and superior interpretive standard. As a foundational framework for human interaction, this Standard defines individual sovereignty as a condition precedent to the validity of any third-party system, prevailing over any non-consensual, unilateral obligation.

ARTICLE I

Every individual possesses the inalienable right to independently hold and produce technical evidence of identity, titles, and property. All such systems shall guarantee that direct and autonomous access to primary protocols remains a permanent option, ensuring no intermediary may act as the universal gatekeeper of an individual's existence.

ARTICLE II

No measure of enforcement, sanction, or transfer within any such system may be automated or imposed without prior, explicit, and verifiable bilateral consent. The validity of any action derives exclusively from its compliance with a contractual commitment freely entered into by the concerned parties.

ARTICLE III

The legitimacy of any such system is predicated upon effective freedom of dissociation. Every individual retains the right to migrate personal value, reputation, and assets to alternative systems without being subject to dispossession or loss of rights.
